Human Rights and Sustainable Development

To achieve sustainability, decisions at all levels must consider the three interconnected pillars of sustainable development socio-cultural, economic and environmental systems. What Mary Robinson is saying that it is people who are at the centre of sustainable development: human beings who are entitled to certain basic living conditions. By effectively linking human rights and sustainable

Project MUSE - Human Rights and Environmental ...

Woods considers human rights and environmental sustainability separately. In her consideration of human rights, she looks at language, values, and regimes with a view to establishing whether the human rights framework is a hospitable framework for addressing environmental issues. She then focuses on two issues: the legitimacy of human rights regimes and their capacity to host environmental
