Anne Norton rejects the 'clash of civilisations' view of Islam and the west, but offers little to replace it, writes Lawrence Rosen

A review of On the Muslim Question, by Anne Norton
The Jewish question was long a topic of concern in post-Enlightenment political thought. Jews were the unassimilated other that called into question the impartiality, universal rationality and secularism of modern political theory and practice. Anne Norton argues that the Muslim question

Norton is right: in order for democracy to resurge in the 21st century, the Muslim Question will need to be solved. But it won't be as easy as she fervently claims. But it won't be as easy as she

Norton, A.: On the Muslim Question \(Hardcover and Ebook ...

For better or worse, "the Muslim question" has become the great question of our time. It is a question bound up with others--about freedom of speech, terror, violence, human rights, women's dress, and sexuality. Above all, it is tied to the possibility of democracy. In this fearless, original, and surprising book, Anne Norton demolishes the notion that there is a "clash of civilizations"

In On the Muslim Question Anne Norton attempts to demolish the dominant view in the post-9/11 context in Europe and the United States of a clash between Islam and the West. The clash is articulated in neat terms. Both Islam and the West are seen as monolithic entities, incapable of existing together. Since the West supports democracy, freedom of speech, equality, and human rights plus the liberation of women, the argument goes, it must be in conflict with Islam, which does not submit itself
