Studying the Aging Worker: Research Designs and ...

After a review of concepts from life span developmental psychology, the authors explain how Schaie's (1965) general developmental model can be used to examine the effects of age, cohort, time period, and seniority on workplace behavior. A number of specific research designs are described, including conventional and sequential methods, along with various analytical techniques that contribute to the study of work and aging. Special attention is given to strategies for avoiding problems.
