study of German and French railways up to 1914. The Great Train Race follows a chronological organization; Mitchell divides his study into three periods, covering the years 1815 1870, 1870 1890, and 1890 1914 respectively, and discusses the most important aspects of railway construction and exploitation in France and Germany during each. His main topics are

From their origins, railways produced an intense competition between the two major continental systems in France and Germany. Fitting a new technology into existing political institutions and social habits, these two nations became inexorably involved in industrial and commercial rivalry that eventually escalated into the armed conflict of 1914.
